LORE

The Thracians were an Indo-European-speaking people who lived in southern Europe. One theory suggests they were the original inhabitants of the region, while another suggests they have connections to tribes in West Asia. Yet another theory proposes that they evolved from the interbreeding of indigenous peoples in southeastern Europe and migrant tribes from Asia. Influencing both Greek and Roman cultures, the Thracians left an indelible mark on the evolution of European society. The Greeks and Romans may have borrowed heavily from Thracian religious practices and legend.

LORE

The Thracians were renowned for their military prowess and were frequently hired out as soldiers. Strong Trojan warriors were portrayed by Homer in "The Iliad." Herodotus said the Thracians and Indians were the two most populous peoples and that the Thracians would be unstoppable as a unified force if only they could stop warring. For nearly five centuries before being overrun by the Roman Empire in 46 AD, the Thracians had tried to establish a state known as the Odrysian Kingdom. The Thracians were renowned for their prowess in battle, their ability to craft beautiful jewelry and ornamentation, and their alcohol. Warfare among the Thracians was frequent because of their ability and ferocity as warriors. Multiple impressive golden treasures of Thracian origin have been found in Bulgaria, attesting to the fact that the Thracians were also known for creating fine jewelry and ornamentation. Some theories that support the notion of the Thracians being the original inhabitants of this land point to the Thracians as the creators of the oldest golden treasure in the world discovered in northeastern Bulgaria near the city of Varna and dating back to 6000 years BC. (Varna Necropolis) The Thracians' wine, however, is what truly established them as a world-renowned viticulture culture. Wine played an important role in numerous ceremonies practiced by the ancient Thracians. Some of the most significant rites and cults practiced by the Thracians were influenced by Zagreus, the God of Wine (also known as Dionysus by the Greeks and Bacchus by the Romans). There may be disagreements about the Thracians' beginnings and ultimate destiny, but there's no denying that their legacy lives on in the present-day culture of Bulgaria and the rest of the Balkans.

THRACIAN GAMES

In ancient Thracia, the traditional Thracian Games (similar to the Greek Olympics) were held in a few warrior disciplines, including running in full battle armour, javelin throwing, archery, chariot racing, boxing, wrestling and other activities, to select the best warriors, and award them with the Golden Laurels (gold gilded oak leaves).
